Concerning the request to demolish the house at 764 Waterloo Street:

Would it not be possible to preserve and repair the building as a residence or professional office to serve at least as an attractive transition from the residential streetscape immediately north of the property to the no doubt strictly commercial establishment destined for the corner of Waterloo and Oxford?

There is no hard evidence of calamitous structural decay to the house, and externally it retains lots of period features worth preserving as well as a pleasing form.

Why build fake heritage when you already have real?
